Inhalte

In this module, we want to unlearn "copyright", i.e. a particular social construction consisting of individual authorship, stable works, audiences, personal property, and markets. It emerged in Europe of the 18th and 19th century. Not only is this construction far from universal, but its global application imposes considerable violence on practices that do not fit its categories. For a long time, these have been primarily those rooted in non-western traditions that always had very different concepts of works of art and their social life. Today, in the digital world, the problematic construction of copyright becomes visible also in the West, in day-to-day practices in social media as well as in temporary forms of art which are based on re-use, flexible forms of authorship and abundance beyond markets. We will start with the notion of "unlearning" from post-colonial theory, and then move back and forth between non-western and digital cultural practices.

Felix Stalder (*1968) researches the interrelation of society, culture and technologies. At the ZHdK he heads the research project "Creating Commons", which examines artistic projects that generate free resources. He is a founding member of the artistic research platform "Technopolitics" and the "World Information Institute", both in Vienna.
