Inhalte	Being in transit is a permanent state of the “New East” (post-soviet/Eastern European countries). Through the change of regimes, social unrest has been a major factor in their contemporary history - placing them in a state where the only permanence is change. Whilst the unreliability of governments, politics and identities is challenging (to say the least), it can also lead to an unexpected, precious capability for the 21st century: the ability to constantly re-invent and re-write identities, histories and futures. It is a state of becoming, of transitioning, of translating from one status to another. Kazakhstan, where our collaboration is rooted, is a prime example of these transformations: often omitted from contemporary art discourses and discourses of decolonization, the former Soviet republic's society continues to undergo dramatic shifts in self-imaging, which are most visible in its art scene. Young Kazakh artists dwell on questions of belonging; defying, criticising, but also reinventing traditional notions of East and West.

In this Lab, we would like to explore the idea of travelling from East to West (where does one end and the other begin?), challenging the notion of borders, through different (digital/analogue) spaces and set the focus on the process of transitioning between "states". We will critically explore the challenges of a Kazakh or Swiss identity, both similarly straddled between multiple, often contradictory ideas. By experiencing one's self through the eyes of the Other - a problematic term to begin with! - we depart on a journey which critically looks at both the own position and artistic practice and at the corresponding transformational dynamics.

Participants from the ZHdK will digitally collaborate with artists from Kazakhstan and create artworks together, exploring questions such as: How does an artwork change in transit? What happens in-between? In the spaces that are neither here nor there? In the ambiguous, amorphous slosh that is the digital transmission of ideas? What gets lost in translation, what is gained? And is the message you send the same that is received?

After getting to know each other digitally, students will have the opportunity to develop a collaborative artwork which explores the above topics and present it in an exhibition (location to be defined - ideally in a third space, where no one of the group members is in sole control or "at home").

The project "QWAS: Migrating Dialogue" has been collaborating with the School of Artistic Gesture since 2017. Based in Almaty, Kazakhstan, it is a non-governmental initiative for contemporary art education, founded by the Eurasian Cultural Alliance (ECA). In past formats within the MA Transdisciplinarity, we have explored topics of identity, non-places, borders, transculturality, otherness and trains.
