Inhalte

This seminar looks at art created in reaction to traumatic events in the 20th and 21st century, as well as the influence of Horror – as a genre emerging in literature and effectively adapted by popular culture – on contemporary visual art. Both world wars had a tremendous effect on artists, e.g. Expressionist Ernst Ludwig Kirchner came back from WWI "shell shocked" and was sent to a Sanatorium in Davos where he created paintings that fused his psychological state with the experience of the alpine landscape. European Fascism and WWII inflicted the most drastic atrocities of the Holocaust, reflected e.g. in the radical sculptures of Polish-Jewish artist Alina Szapocznikow, and also instigating a deep philosophical debate in the postwar era on a re-conception of culture after this collapse of humanity. This debate initiated e.g. the documenta in Kassel. To the Atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki the Japanese Gutai group reacted in the 1950s in ground-breaking performances, and Alain Resnais directed "Hiroshima Mon Amour", based on the novel by Marguerite Duras. The Vietnam War caused a wave of Protest Art – like Yoko Ono and John Lennon's 1969 'bed-in of peace' "Make Love, Not War". In the 1980s, Horror became a favourite genre in popular culture, e.g. in Michael Jackson's Goth-Pop "Thriller", which in turn had strong resonance in the visual arts. The movie "Alien" added a dark feminist sci-fi turn to the genre. In queer culture, heroes of Horror movies and novels – monsters of all kinds – became figures of identification for their outsider status, signifying everything society fears and declares as abject or degenerate. In the beginning of the 21st century events like 9/11 caused yet another trauma-induced cultural-political shift.
